We have hit the winter doldrums this week for sure! I am thrilled when I see classes going out to enjoy the season of winter and the continuation of classroom learning with going outs and most importantly service to others in our community. I know planning outings is extra work and responsibility and they can be impacted with the weather however; it is what our kids need most right now. Learning to enjoy all weather builds resilience and helps remind us all about the greater world outside these brick walls. When kids become egocentric it is a good sign, they need to focus their energy and attention on those less fortunate. When they are unable to sit still and focus it is a good sign, they need more movement. As emotions run hot and cold it is a good sign, we all need a good forest bath. I am hopeful as a family you can engage in some "going outs" as well. It teaches our children that we don't wait for sunny days to experience joy. It runs through all seasons.
